The 14th century Moroccan traveller Ibn Battuta came to the island of Sarandib or Lanka in 1344 to embark on pilgrimage up Adam's Peak having travelled from Morocco on his way to China. After 29 years of travelling he returned to Morocco and wrote about his travels in a book commonly called The Rihla today. Some 700 years later, writer Ameena Hussein decided to search for traces of Ibn Battuta in her own country, Sri Lanka and to document what he found and wrote about his travels in the country the Arabs called the Island of Rubies. Beginning her journey where Ibn Battuta landed in the coastal town of Puttalam, she goes on to meet a multitude of characters – from a sack sewing muezzin to a lone monk living on top of a rock, to a marriage broker on his way to broker a marriage. On her journey she unearths fantastic tales, visits historical mosques, and records a landscape that is as ancient as time. She also reveals the history of her minority community – the Muslims – who have lived on the island for a thousand years adapting and acculturating to make it truly their home and the conundrums that a multicultural country like Sri Lanka faces from time to time. Her lecture will focus on what Ibn Battuta said about his journey here and what she discovered in trying to unearth them on her travels – from precious stones, to the pilgrimage to the magnificent temple at Devi Nuvara. It will be a journey blending the 14th century with the 21st and highlight Lanka's rich cultural history and past.
